Menu Birth of a Double On a Friday afternoon we sit down to dinner, a perfunctory meal before we send in our application and on the weekend we don't eat meat. We have been invited to a friend's wedding and on the morning of the wedding he breaks his foot. Not like a butterfly breaking, more like a beetle breaking the crust of the earth. I feel like we have gone on a road trip as a family and found ourselves halfway to the destination and now we're left to find our way home. On Sunday morning I go running alone, the first time in nearly two years I've run alone. I find myself in an unfamiliar part of town but I know this city, and I know how to get home. I have found myself in my city before. I've run past it many times and I remember that there is a beautiful park to the east and a statue of a woman and a girl. I pass a landmark I've never noticed before: a double stroller. It is a sight I have never seen before, it is a double stroller, this city is large but not that large. I have no idea why a mother would have such a double stroller but for some reason I do. As I run past, I stop to have a look and I see the name of the company on the seat and that the children are Asian. I think about 82157476af
